

Windward to offer open access to shipping insights to help fight coronavirus

New live map enables users to understand global shipping activity, see where vessels are coming and going, and assess the impact of COVID-19 on trade over time

March 24, 2020: Joining the global fight against COVID-19, Windward, a world leader in maritime analytics, will provide open access to its data and insights, offering a greater understanding of global trade flows - helping to strike a balance between protecting public health and maintaining global economic stability.

The new, interactive COVID-19 Shipping Map, is a publicly-accessible tool that gives users aggregated information on global maritime journeys, including types of ships, their origins and - critical in terms of the virus incubation period - time spent at sea.

Ami Daniel, Windward CEO, said: "Watching this global pandemic unfold, I knew we had to do whatever we could to help. We want this tool to enable everyone - including researchers, ports, governments, health officials, and the general public - to see that even in the face of COVID-19, the global shipping industry plays a critical role in ensuring supplies can continue to come in. The maritime ecosystem is strong, and together, we're stronger."

A screenshot of the map is included below. The map itself is live, and can be accessed via: <https://covid19map.wnwd.com/>
